THE THEATER.

New National Theater. One of the greatest difficulties in the interpretation of stage literature lies in the fact that few women can realize the ideal of feminine beauty which the enthusiastic imagination of the author creates. He has often said that no woman can develop the intellectuality needful for a correct rendition of the role of Juliet until she is too old to look the part, and, similarly, it is more or less chilling to discover that the lady whose charms have been rapturously extolled by numerous suitors is one whose personal appearance must be re-deemed by her art. The announcement that a charming woman sets out to have her own way is in itself alluring. And the presence of Miss Maxine Elliott in the principal role is a sufficient assurance that the adjective "charming" will apply in its full force and not be merely a figure of speech, a supposition which a courteous au-dience will not dispute. In "Her Own Way" Miss Elliott has found a play which suits her to perfection. However much the woman who seeks to dominate in all things may be distrusted, the one who chooses to liott interprets such a character with a chance gentle grace that is wholly free from the Lilyan. pretty asperities that the title might suggest. There are scenes of delightful comedy, incidents of delicate pathos and moments of sincere emotion, and in all of these Miss Elliott maintains herself securely and easily. There is a frank simplicity about her work that renders her as fascinating to her auditors as her role is to the characters with whom she is surrounded on the stage. There is no attempt to attain sensational dramatic heights. It is an honest, unaffected picture of a most gracious lady.

Mr. Fitch's play is characteristic. It deals with social life, and opens with a children's party, which cannot fail to please those who enjoy theatric precocity. It has an abundance of smart talk. In one of her speeches the heroine declares that in former times the fatal bullet was stopped by a prayer book or a package of love letters in the sol-diers pocket, but now it is stopped by a cigarette case. Mr. Fitch, with his devotion to the superficialities and conventions, is in sympathy with the new order of sentiment He is essentially and pre-eminently the dra-matist of the cigarette case. But he does not wholly disdain the package of love letters in this play, and the result is a wholesome current of genuine feeling and simple human-ity. The play is enlivened by a series of smart monologues, delivered by Miss Geor-gia Lawrence in the role of a hairdresser. This pert young woman is in doubt whether to buy her sweetheart a copy of Homer's "Iliad" or "Lucille." She decides in favor of "Lucille." It is a smart and effective satire on the popular taste in literary mat-ters and may not be without its significance in connection with some of Mr. Fitch's own

The most interesting character in the piece is the villain. For years we have been regarding this personage with undis guised aversion and rejoicing when he was foiled. The villain in this piece is a man who would stop at nothing, who tells the girl that she shall be his at any cost, and who does not hesitate to conduct a finan-cial transaction equivalent to or even worse than foreclosing the mortgage when it comes due. But, just the same, he is a man with blood in his veins and purpose in his heart, and the audience forgets tradition so far as to applaud instead of hissing him. The part was capitally played by William Courtleigh. The play is finely cast, Eva Vincent's portrayal of the socially ambitios, luxury-loving stepmother being conspicuous

"The Earl of Pawtucket," which opened its first engagement in Washington at the Columbia Theater last night, was heralded as one of the most extraordinary laughing as one of the most extraordinary laughing successes of recent years, and its reception fully bore out these hilarious promises. He possesses a keen sense of humor, and is peculiarly happy in developing the picturesque and interesting side of American life. He possesses not only a close observation of characters, but the faculty of viewing them in perspective as one from abroad might do. Mr. Thomas has declared that he wrote this play in order to prove that 'Lawrance D'Orsay was true,' and his suc-cess as a playwright may be measured to some extent by the accuracy by which he has adjusted the principal character to the has adjusted the principal character to the star's personality. Several seasons ago, when Mr. D'Orsay appeared in this city, he was welcomed as a highly emtertaining player, but his stellar possibilities were unsuspected. Mr. Thomas must be credited with being both the prospector and the promoter of a mine of humor whose richness seems inexhaustible. The Englishman abroad has been travestied again and again. Paris loves nothing better than to make sport of its cousins across the channel. "The Earl of Pawtucket" has all the piquancy of Gallic wit at British expense, with none of its harshness. The earl is a capital fellow, whose blunders, ludicrous as they are, are those of good nature rather than stupidity. The story deals with characters in New York and Washington, but the scenes are not drawn with sufficient detail to present any notable local interest It is simply a delightful evening's enter-tainment, more coherent than the ordinary farce, witty and at the same time tactful It leaves no doubt that the dramatist may find an abundance of material for good substantial work here at home, provided he has the perception and the skill needful for the > wisely kept in evidence for the major portion of every act. While the character of the earl was already successfully framed for the playwright by Mr. D'Orsay's striking personality, Mr. Thomas has not lost prestige in the drawing of the people with whom he has surrounded the central figure. One of the most interesting of these is "Wilkins," the valet, who is as typical in his way as his titled, master. As played by Errect Ellen. titled master. As played by Ernest Elton this part assumes a large share of the element which makes for success. It is enacted with unflagging earnestness and intelliligent conception. Mr. Thomas has also shown the results of his experiences in the cafes of New York by a very clever characterization of the "help" to be found about such places. The brewer, the senator, the western father are distinctive individualities capably portrayed. The feminine continequal to the demands of the p.ece.

Mr. D'Orsay was called upon for a speech at the end of the second act. He is very glad to be in Washington again, where he has spent many pleasant days, and hopes to be back soon again, if the indulgent play-goers will permit.

The show is structurally the same as it The show is structurally the same as it was when last presented here, and the cast in the present instance is sufficiently strong to bring out its salient points in stage effects as well as in the music. Sevand a specialty by the Faust sisters, who display exceptional agility and grace in an acrobatic dance, adds much to the production. Stella Mayhew in the part of "Moggie Webbington," ingenue of the Sophocles Dramatic Company, is the star. Miss Mayhew exhibits considerable versatility and received encore after encore for the clever way in which she sang a collection of coon songs. Miss Mayhew has an attractive stage presence as well about two weeks. While the vessel is at as a chic style, and made many friends Baltimore her class of midshipmen and by her enthusiastic work. The comedy by her enthusiastic work. The comedy element is cared for by Sam J. Mylie in the part of "Dionysius Fly," the manager, &c., of the Sophocles Dramatic Co.; Sid H. Forrester as "Lord Dyce;" R. E. Warren, the agile property man of the dramatic company, and Chas. R. Haigh, the leading "heavy" of the company. Mr. Fred. Truesdell has a tenor of moderate range and strength, but the quality of his voice is exceptionally good. "The Show Girl" is handsomely staged and costumed.

successes," did one of the "speak-from-der-face-out" turns and carefully observed the traditions of Thespian Hollanders, and though some of the jests were reminiscent, they were productive of jolly gurgles. The great Sandor trio performed feats of strength, that measured in foot tons would represent two days' work for a laborer. They did usual and unusual things with the flying rings. Each of the trio is a fine example of physical culture, and their act is highly picturesque as well as sufprising. George H. Wood an ehonized monologuist. George H. Wood, an ebonized monologuist, delivered a disjointed comic lecture on some rather funereal topics and subse-quently recited a budget of jingles which amused. Loris and Altina, rifle shots, gave a clever exhibition of marksmanship. At a clever exhibition of marksmanship. At times the act took a venturous turn, the man shooting plaster balls from the woman's head and hands, and the woman shooting through a small ring held by the man between his fingers. Hal Davis, Wal-ter D. Green, William E. Powell and Miss Iner Macauley gave a one-act play, entitled "Pals." It is a tabloid drama, ending with a rough-and-tumble scrimmage which threatens to break everything on the stage, including the ribs of the performers. The Misses Carmen, banjoists, played the Poet and Peasant overture and responded to two encores. Herbert Lloyd, a jester and magician, who lets one into the secre consult her own heart in the choice of a of his magic, and who works in a great deal husband commands admiration. Empire Theater. The attraction this week at the Empire Theater, Lillian Mortimer's scenic production, "In the Shadow of the Gallows," did not fail to please. There was no lack of stirring episodes and breathless climaxes in the melodrama, and the intensity was pleasantly broken by frequent interpolations of humor, furnished by Charles H. Boyle and Marcella Gerard. Dancing and singing specialties were also introduced by Alice Lewis, who joined the company in this city, and by Mr. Boyle. Miss Mortimer's work both in the serious and lighter parts was such as to hold the attention of the audience. The plot on which hangs the exciting incidents is a double one. James Remitrom, an old man, who when young wronged a gipsy girl, is anxious that his son John marry before his father's death. The latter complies with this wish rying the same evening he is made aware of it a beautiful young girl named Edris Dale. The nuptial gaylety is suddenly interrupted by the murder of the old father at the hands of the wronged gipsy's daughter. An accomplice aids the murderess and together they nearly bring young John to the gallows. There is a mystery surrounding the life of Edris' mother that is the basis for the second plot. The two stories are woven closely together and bring each other to happy endings. The two villians are folled and those who have done right saved from disgrace.

ance with "The White Slave," extending back over a number of years, it is hardly neccessary to comment extensively on the production which has been engaged to entertain the Academy patrons this week. The members of this play's cast at times have been persons who now rank at the top of their profession. Each member of the company now presenting it is possessed of the ability necessary for a creditable performance. The story is one of southern life pre-vious to the great civil strife between north and south, and concerns Lisa, a supposed octoroon girl, but who, as events show, is a white girl. Stage craftsmanship has been used to good advantage in the third act, showing the cabin of the steamer Belle when an explosion occurs. A quick curtain follows, only to rise again almost instantly, exhibiting to view a party of wrecked passengers in a small boat, making their way toward land, while in the disnine characters being in the hands of Constance Hamblin and Jessie Burnett, the
